SIX SECONDS FROM ETERNITY!

I

What Happened to the United States Air Service Photographers Who Went by Night to Take a Picture of Rochester, N. Y., and How They Managed to Escape the Mighty Flashlight Bomb Released From Their Craft

THREE THOUSAND FEET above the city of Rochester, N. Y., there scared one night very recently a lone airplane. Loudly its-motors thundered, shrilly its drift-wires sang as it cut the air at terrific speed above tho city where tiny lights gleamed like jewels through the black pall of night.

The plane was a Martin bomber, built and equipped to drop heavy explosives down on hostile armies and enemy cities in the stern business of war. But on this night it carried a lighter, stranger load. There was a bomb of sorts, but a bomb whose purpose was not destruction. There were cameras, too. The plane was making an experiment which, if successful' would have a far-reaching effect upon aerial photography as well as upon the warfare of the future.

Suddenly one of the leather-hooded figures in the fuselage dropped from the plane the small torpedo it carried. Six seconds elapsed—then there was in midair a powerful detonation.
